Introduction: A Brief History of CRAG

The Portland region enjoys a unique status as a center of strong regional planning and coordination. The robustness of Metro as a regional government at the beginning of the twenty-first century bears witness to that reputation. Yet the road to Portland's current regional government structure was by no means a smooth one. Given the relatively weak state of regional planning and coordination in the Portland area during the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s, what was the role of the Columbia Region Association of Governments (CRAG) in the rise of Portland as a national model of regional government?

Precursors

One can trace the roots of planning in the Portland metropolitan area back to the mid-1920s, when the State of Oregon commissioned a study of the structure of local government. In 1926, it published its recommendations chief of which was the consolidation of the City of Portland and Multnomah County. The state legislature proceeded simply to ignore it. With the economic revival that occurred during World War II and the problems that went with such growth, the state responded by authorizing county planning commissions and county-level zoning to complement municipal planning powers. Moreover, the state's creation of three significant agencies—the Joint Legislative Interim Committee on Local Government (1956); the 4-member Metropolitan Planning Commission (1957-1966), and the Portland-Vancouver Metropolitan Transportation Study (1959-1967)—marked significant leaps toward a more systematic approach to regional planning and coordination. Still, problems persisted into the early 1960s, at which point the hodgepodge of special service districts and planning agencies that had emerged in the past two decades had increased substantially in number to the point where genuinely effective regional coordination seemed less of a reality.

While suburbanites were engaged in incorporating new municipalities as a measure to counteract annexation by the central city, progressive good government proponents and business organizations were calling for efficiency, accountability, and systematic study of metropolitan problems and organization by professional experts. Responding to such calls, the Oregon state legislature in 1961 created the Interim Committee on Local Government Problems, which, in turn, recommended the creation of the Portland Metropolitan Study Commission (PMSC). Operating between 1964 and 1971, the PMSC brought about some of the deepest changes to the structure of government in the Portland region. Coupled with the establishment of this commission—or perhaps a deeper cause that helped bring it about—profound changes in public attitudes regarding suburbanization helped bring about a widespread commitment to sound regional government. First deploring the dreary and generic development of suburbs before coming to view sprawl as a disaster for the natural environment, the public during the late 1960s and early 1970s played a significant role in realizing strong regional government in the Portland metropolitan area.

Formation

In spite of the widespread success that proponents of regional government experienced on multiple levels during the late 1960s, discontent was never far from the horizon. With their growing populations—and with their increasingly urgent demands for better coordination of planning and services—suburbs in the Portland area chafed at what they characterized as the inattention of the Metropolitan Planning Commission, a four-member body made up of one representative from the City of Portland and one from Multnomah, Washington, and Clackamas counties. Encouraged by the success of the Salem-area council of governments, the PMSC responded in 1965 began to research whether a similar arrangement was possible in Portland. As further catalyst, the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) in 1966 mandated that every metropolitan area in the United States establish and maintain some form of representation for 90% of its residents if that area was to qualify for HUD grants. Additionally, the U.S. Department of Transportation required some form of regional government in order for states to receive federal highway funding. As a consequence, most metropolitan regions of the country turned to the council of governments model. Portland was no exception.

With the backing and guidance of the PMSC—and with the sometimes reluctant support of suburban governments who would not have entered into a regional government agreement had federal regulations not required such an entity—representatives of the various city and county governments in Multnomah, Washington, and Clackamas counties met in February 1966 to discuss the formation of a regional council of governments. Later that spring and summer, a PMSC-appointed committee drafted bylaws and a stock-language membership agreement for a regional agency. Representatives of Portland area governments accepted the work of the drafting committee in July 1966 and agreed to the creation of the Columbia Region Association of Governments (CRAG) in October of that year.

Key to ameliorating suburban concerns over the old Metropolitan Planning Commission, which CRAG absorbed upon its creation, the CRAG Constitution provided for direct representation of all participating municipalities and county governments in a General Assembly. Furthermore, the Constitution specified that each city and county delegation appoint one member to the Executive Committee, which was alternately called the Executive Board and the Board of Directors at various stages in time and which ostensibly carried out the policy directives of the General Assembly. Additionally, the CRAG Constitution stipulated the Executive Committee's appointment of an Executive Secretary, alternately called the Executive Director, and the hiring of staff members as the Committee saw fit. Finally, the Constitution outlined the annual financial contribution of member governments according to the proportion of population that a particular member represented relative to the total population represented by all member governments.

Although the CRAG constitution gave the General Assembly the responsibility of formulating policy, most individuals who represented their respective governments on this body were part-time officials who spent most of their already limited time attending to local issues. Few had an interest in dedicating time to regional concerns. Given these circumstances, CRAG's Executive Committee operated largely as the de facto center of power in CRAG. Meeting much more frequently than the General Assembly and composed of individuals who were more often stronger proponents of regional government than one might have otherwise found on the General Assembly, the Executive Committee had closer contact with day-to-day issues and those inside and outside the agency who dealt with them, technical research reports, staff work, and emerging points of regional concern. What is more, a host of committees including the Advisory Committee, the Transportation

Technical Advisory Committee, and a wide variety of other groups emerged throughout CRAG's lifespan and exercised significant power in guiding the policymaking and actions of the agency. The most important and visible issues under CRAG's management included comprehensive planning, land use planning, and transportation. Other areas included criminal justice, parks and recreation, fresh and wastewater, solid waste, pollution, and energy production and consumption. (For more on specific areas of concern with which CRAG engaged, see descriptive summaries for each section in Collection Divisions and Subdivisions listings.)

Decline

Seemingly from the outset, CRAG suffered numerous problems. In general, the agency's weakness stemmed largely from its advisory role to member governments. In its capacity as regional advisor, CRAG did not have the authority to implement its planning and recommendations. The agency's weakness manifested itself in two particularly notable ways: (1) conflicts of interest between local municipalities and regional government and (2) funding. First, since members of the General Assembly and the Executive Committee were representatives first and foremost of their municipal or county governments, many remained loyal to the interests of their "home" government agencies and thus ignored proposals that would have benefited the region as a whole at the expense of particular local interests. Compounding this problem, elected offices in the suburbs were most often part-time positions that their occupants held in addition to pursuing their own careers. Many suburban members of CRAG simply had neither the inclination nor the time to devote to regional issues. As a consequence, consensus over regional solutions often eluded members of CRAG. Related to the problem of conflicting interests were difficulties over stable funding. Since CRAG was dependent upon the contributions of member city and county governments, it could not afford to alienate those members by pursuing a robust program of regional initiatives at the expense of local interests. In addition, since the City of Portland had the largest population proportional to the population of CRAG's entire jurisdiction, it bore much of the responsibility of funding CRAG, compelling the suburban government to ignore CRAG all the more.

In an attempt to solve some of these problems, the Oregon state legislature mandated CRAG membership for all city and county governments within CRAG's jurisdiction by April 1974. While this measure may have stabilized CRAG's funding by means of those dues that came from its now obligatory membership base, it also exacerbated worries about the City of Portland's growing dominance over CRAG. Especially after the election of Neil Goldschmidt as Portland mayor in 1972 and the rise of his planning and development program, antipathy between the central city and the suburbs grew. Especially notable was the victory that opponents of the Mt. Hood Freeway won upon that project's removal from the federal interstate highway system in 1975. Since 1966, CRAG had housed the Portland-Vancouver Metropolitan Area Transportation Study, an agency that tended to follow the classic highway-era solution of extensive freeway construction. In this context, the resolution of the Mt. Hood Freeway controversy underscored the extent to which the City of Portland, which stood to lose on so many fronts if the project was completed, blocked CRAG's regional transportation planning at the expense of suburban residents, who would have benefited a great deal from an expanded metropolitan highway network. The city's victory also highlighted the increasingly close relationship that CRAG staff members enjoyed with the City of Portland Office of Planning and Development.

On top of tensions among CRAG membership, the general public's criticism of CRAG grew more intense during the early and mid-1970s. Although a significant portion of the Portland region supported CRAG's planning initiatives and its attempts to preserve the natural environment, many others saw it as yet another layer of inefficient government bureaucracy that encroached upon their property rights and that fumbled its delivery of transportation, utility, and land development programs.

Merger with MSD

In an effort to ameliorate some of the problems that surrounded CRAG and its planning functions, a number of regional government proponents assembled what became a successful grant application to the National Academy for Public Administration. The grant from this organization funded the Tri-County Local Government Commission, which functioned between 1975 and 1977 and which sought to design no less than a government that would attend to the planning and service needs of the entire Multnomah, Washington, and Clackamas county region. In the middle of 1976, the Tri-County Commission made its recommendations to the Oregon state legislature. Most notable was its proposal to combine CRAG with the Metropolitan Service District, an agency that the voters approved in 1970 to function as a general-purpose container holding as many concrete services benefiting the Portland metropolitan area as possible. As a solution of the conflict between the interests of the region versus those of local government officials who represented their agencies on CRAG, the Tri-County Commission also recommended the direct election of regional councilors who represented districts that coincided with traditional communities. The Tri-County Commission also suggested MSD's absorption of both TriMet and the Port of Portland.

In response, the Oregon state legislature made several changes to the Commission's recommendations. It maintained a merger with CRAG and the formation of an elected council, one that was somewhat reduced in size; reduced MSD's geographic coverage; added the possibility of a tax base for the agency; dropped the possibility of a merger with TriMet and the Port of Portland; and required voter approval for the entire package during elections in May 1978.

Titled "Reorganize Metropolitan Service District, Abolish CRAG," the ballot measure won a 55% majority across Multnomah, Washington, and Clackamas counties—that is, CRAG's entire jurisdiction. MSD's proposed reduced geographic coverage ironically compelled many regional government opponents who lived within CRAG's jurisdiction to vote in favor of a fortified MSD, a move that, in effect, was a vote to remove themselves from the reach of regional government. In all, most of the margin of victory came from Multnomah County. Washington County voters favored the measure only by a slim majority whereas Clackamas County rejected it by 2000 votes. In compliance with the terms of the measure, CRAG merged its work into MSD by the end of 1978 and ceased to exist on January 1, 1979.

Evaluation

While CRAG was beset with serious problems, it operated during an era that saw profound changes in state government and public opinion that enabled the rise of regional approaches to governance. Working in tandem with the state and its willingness to shepherd land use planning and regional government—a commitment that was unusually strong compared to the rest of the nation—CRAG innovated several elements that have become major parts of regional government in the Portland region. The agency also set a new precedent for the reach of regional government in the area, and it laid the groundwork for a more robust Metropolitan Service District to take over regional planning and services in the late 1970s. In all, in spite of the difficulties it encountered during its lifespan, CRAG played a crucial role in the emergence of Portland's regional approach to solving problems that affect the entire metropolitan area.

Chronology of CRAG

1956	The Joint Legislative Interim Committee on Local Government examines annexation, service districts, and planning issues, raises the idea of “urban area councils,” and recommends further study of metropolitan government.
1957	The City of Portland and Multnomah, Washington, and Clackamas counties establish the four-member Metropolitan Planning Commission. It operated until 1966, at which point CRAG absorbed its staff and projects.
1959	The Portland-Vancouver Metropolitan Transportation Study begins its work. It operated until 1967, at which point CRAG took control of the agency.
1961	The Oregon state legislature creates the Interim Committee on Local Government Problems.
1963	The Interim Committee on Local Government Problems recommends the creation of the Portland Metropolitan Study Commission (PMSC), which operated between 1964 and 1971.
1965	PMSC begins investigating a more inclusive council of governments to replace the Metropolitan Planning Commission.
1966	The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development mandates that all metropolitan areas that receive planning and infrastructure funding provide representation of 90% of metropolitan area residents in a metropolitan planning organization. PMSC hosts officials from Multnomah, Washington, and Clackamas counties and from city governments within those counties to discuss the formation of a council of governments that became CRAG. A PMSC-committee appoints a CRAG bylaw drafting committee that works during the spring and summer. This committee writes a constitution for CRAG that provides for a General Assembly and an Executive Committee (also called Executive Board and Board of Directors at various points in time). The CRAG General Assembly meets for the first time on October 13.
1969	The Oregon state legislature creates the Portland Metropolitan Area Local Government Boundary Commission. The legislature specifies that no elected officials could serve on the commission, thereby barring any members of CRAG or other councils of government from playing a role in decisions over city or special district boundaries. After concern over burgeoning development in the Willamette Valley, the Oregon state legislature adopts Senate Bill 10, which requires cities and counties to develop comprehensive land use plans that meet ten state guidelines.

After meeting the condition put forth by proponents of regional government that a measure creating the Metropolitan Service District (MSD) appear on the May 1970 ballot, the Oregon state legislature creates TriMet, which took over operation of the Portland area public transportation system from the failing Rose City Transit.

1970	Oregon voters approve a ballot measure creating the MSD.
1973	The Oregon state legislature adopts Senate Bill 100, which strengthened the state's commitment to land use planning by correcting flaws in Senate Bill 10 (1969) and creating the Land Conservation and Development Commission (LCDC).
1974	Senate Bill 769 requires Multnomah, Washington, and Clackamas counties and all municipal governments within those counties to establish membership with CRAG. Before this legislation, membership on the part of those government agencies had been voluntary. The State of Oregon rewrites its planning goals after a series of workshops and public meetings involving around 10,000 participants addressed the issue.
1975	Oregon Governor Robert Straub formally requests removal of the Mt. Hood Freeway from the federal interstate highway system. The controversy over the proposed project and its ultimate elimination demonstrated the large degree to which the City of Portland exercised influence over CRAG and transportation planning in general. The Portland Metropolitan Area Local Government Boundary Commission sponsors a successful grant application to the National Academy for Public Administration, thus creating the Tri-County Local Government Commission.
1976	In February and March, CRAG holds a series of public hearings to gather testimony in reaction to the proposed Land Use Framework Element of the CRAG Regional Plan. The Eugene-based Committee to Restore Local Control of Land Planning adds a ballot measure that proposed abolishing all councils of government in Oregon and CRAG in particular. Although the measure failed, it marked a loss of confidence in CRAG's ability to address regional concerns. The Tri-County Local Government Commission recommends merging CRAG into MSD and the direct election of regional policymakers on MSD, among other proposals. In December, the CRAG Board of Directors adopts the Land Use Framework Element of the CRAG Regional Plan, a document that establishes land use planning policy.
1977	In May, the CRAG Board of Directors adopts the Planning and Adoption Process of the Land Use Framework Element of the CRAG Regional Plan, a document that outlines the process by which the agency conducts land use planning. The Oregon state legislature modifies the Tri-County Local Government Commission's recommendations regarding a CRAG-MSD merger by reducing the proposed council size from 15 to 12, eliminating a proposed Executive Director's veto power, reducing

the geographic coverage of MSD's proposed jurisdiction, dropping MSD's proposed absorption of TriMet and the Port of Portland, and requiring voter approval of the entire CRAG-MSD merger as modified by the state legislature.

1978 Voters in Multnomah, Washington, and Clackamas counties approve the CRAG-MSD merger by a 55% majority.

1979 On January 1, an expanded MSD officially begins operation; CRAG ceases to exist.

Summary Collection Description

This collection documents the work of the Columbia Region Association of Governments (CRAG) from its founding and early days in 1966 to its merger with the Metropolitan Service District (MSD) on January 1, 1979.

Metro acquired this collection through a variety of means and at various points in time. Upon merging with the MSD, CRAG essentially accessioned much of its records to the newly reformed agency. In fact, Metro acquired the bulk of the CRAG Collection through these means. Throughout the 1980s and much of the 1990s, this collection existed in storage unprocessed.

Becky Shoemaker Metro Records Officer /Archivist set the collection aside and reserved it for archival processing. Following this action and the point at which the collection went through systematic inventorying, several staff members at Metro (especially Planning Department staff) contributed additional materials to the collection that had stored in work area over the years. Metro acquired perhaps one third of the collection from these staff members.

During the fall academic terms of 2005 and 2006, groups of practicum students from the Department of History at Portland State University (PSU) inventoried the collection and rearranged its contents in preparation for the creation of a finding aid. Between February and July of 2007, a Metro Council Office intern conducted further archival processing, sharpened the inventory work that Portland State University students had performed, and worked on developing a finding aid to the collection.

Since publishing the Columbia Region Association of Governments (CRAG) finding aid, another twenty linear feet of paper records relating to CRAG were discovered during a warehouse cleanup project. As soon as an inventory of the records is completed, the contents will be incorporated into the CRAG Collection and a new version of the finding aid will be published.

Please Note: The newly discovered records will not be available to the public for research purposes until collection processing is completed.

Collection Divisions and Subdivisions

Collection Division 1: Meeting Records

The bulk of the CRAG collection consists of meeting records from CRAG's principal groups, most notably the Executive Committee/Executive Board/Board of Directors. Meeting records also exist from the General Assembly, the Advisory Committee/General Advisory Board, and the Transportation Technical Subcommittee/Transportation Committee/Transportation Technical Advisory Committee.

[Note: The phrase "meeting packet" denotes any materials associated with a particular meeting - agendas, supporting documents, and completed/approved meeting minutes]

1.01: General Assembly (1966-1978)

The small size of this series of meeting records relative to the size of the Executive Committee serves as one indication of the extent to which the General Assembly influenced the policymaking and the exercise of power within CRAG.

1.02: Executive Committee/Executive Board/Board of Directors

Ostensibly charged with the responsibility to execute the policy of the General Assembly but, in practice, functioning as the center of power within CRAG, the Executive Committee created a prolific series of meeting records. Throughout the CRAG collection, records refer to this body by three names: the Executive Committee (1966-1971), the Executive Board (1971-1974), and the Board of Directors (1974-1978).

1.03: Advisory Committee/General Advisory Board

Spelling out the ancillary powers of the agency, the Constitution of the Columbia Region Association of Governments specified that CRAG had the power "to establish technical study and advisory committees" as one means of carrying out the agency's functions and administrative duties. Characteristic of other CRAG bodies, this group was known as the Advisory Committee (1967-1971) and the General Advisory Board (1971-1973). There is no explanation in the record collection why no Advisory Committee / General Advisory Board records exist past mid-1973.

1.04: Transportation Technical Subcommittee/Transportation Committee/Transportation Technical Advisory Committee

Transportation was a major policy area for CRAG. One indication of this is the fairly substantial collection of meeting records from this body, to which the CRAG records collection refers by various names: the Transportation Technical Subcommittee, the Transportation Committee, and the Transportation Technical Advisory Committee.

Collection Division 2: General Materials

This collection division contains documents that indicate the general organization and thrust of CRAG.

2.01: Organizational Structure, Policy, and General Information

Materials describing the structure, overall policy initiatives, and broad information about the agency are relatively few in number but are nonetheless an important part of the collection.

Collection Division 3: Specific Issues and Responsibilities

Though somewhat limited in number, materials concerning specific issues and responsibilities with which CRAG engaged offer perhaps the most colorful view into the agency's work. Areas of concern include comprehensive planning, regional land use planning, transportation, criminal justice, parks and recreation, fresh and waste water management, pollution, and the CRAG-MSD merger. Documents within this collection division include publications, reports, correspondence, local and state legislation, meeting records pertinent to specific issues, and public testimony.

3.01: Comprehensive Planning

Since the agency's beginnings in 1966, comprehensive planning was a primary function of CRAG. The agency produced several publications, reports, and other documents throughout its tenure, yet the greatest concentration of these materials date from the early to mid-1970s, during which time the Oregon state legislature and governor's office set a forceful mandate for regional planning (for more, 3.02, Land Use Planning).

3.02: Land Use Planning

Particularly during the early and mid-1970s, CRAG functioned as the agency with the primary responsibility for carrying out the land use planning goals and objectives that the Oregon state legislature and governor's office set out. Landmark legislation that established this mandate included Senate Bill 10 (1969) and Senate Bill 100 (1973). This latter piece of legislation created the Land Conservation and Development Commission (LCDC), which monitored local comprehensive plans and determined whether they conformed to state planning guidelines. Note the connection between the passage of this legislation and the proliferation of documents relating to land use planning especially after 1973. Perhaps the central document that CRAG produced during this period is the Land Use Framework Element of the CRAG Regional Plan, adopted by the Board of Directors in December 1976 and by the General Assembly in February 1977.

3.03: Transportation

As the large number of meeting records from the various transportation advisory committees that functioned within CRAG indicates, transportation was a major area of work--and a major source of federal grant funding for the agency. In addition, transportation issues were the topic of a large number of technical studies many of which CRAG published towards the end of its lifespan.

3.04: Criminal Justice

While the prospect of receiving federal grant money drove much of CRAG's engagement with the issue of criminal justice, the actual products of those attempts were few in number.

3.05: Parks and Recreation

CRAG's engagement with the issue of parks and recreation appears limited to the extent that those issues affected its land use planning goals and objectives.

3.06: Fresh Water and Sewerage Management

Similar to its engagement with the issue of criminal justice, CRAG sought funding to conduct studies and bring about regional improvements in the areas of fresh water management and sewerage treatment. As far as the limited number of materials in the CRAG collection on these issues indicates, however, CRAG's success with having a deep effect in this area was relatively small.

3.07. Energy

As the energy issue grew in importance during the mid-1970s, CRAG responded with a handful of reports on energy production and consumption in the Portland area. The CRAG collection does not contain a prolific amount of materials on this issue, however.

3.08. Creation of Metropolitan Service District

Contrasting with the policy-oriented and higher-level planning in which CRAG attempted to engage, the work of the Metropolitan Service District (MSD), created by means of Oregon voter approval in 1970, sought to provide as many concrete regional services as possible. While CRAG did not play a primary role in the creation of the MSD, it did have an interest in the agency and its work.

3.10. CRAG-MSD Merger

At the end of 1978, CRAG merged its planning and policy development operations with the service-oriented MSD after voters approved the combination in May of that year. [See above discussion of the history of CRAG for more on the CRAG-MSD merger]
