Dear Toby:

We selected a picture and ordered six 5x7's to be sent to your office.

Following is a draft biography for the public relations people. Please note that Dick Waker will continue to hold the District 2 Council office until the end of this year and upon assuming this position, I would like to add a third paragraph to the biography that denotes my Metro committee assignments. Therefore, the following draft is presently incomplete.

"A native of Portland, Bauer formerly served as Senior Assistant to the Mayor of Beaverton. He has a Bachelor of Science Degree and a Certificate of Urban Studies from Portland State University.

A former City Manager and Planning Director, he now owns and manages Lawrence Bauer and Associates, Planning and Public Affairs Consultants and serves as the Chairman of the Board of Pentaco Corporation, an Oregon owned investment company."

Sincerely,

Lawrence Bauer

Debate over style lies behind debate over garbage

By JOHN M. GRUND

To District 8 Metro Councilor Judy Wyers, the fights over building a new garbage system for the Metropolitan Service District point up the political immaturity of the 10-year-old council, and that of some of its members.

Metro councilors are being manipulated by such large garbage firms as Waste Management Inc. and its Oregon subsidiary, Oregon Waste Systems, "because they are politically inexperienced, some of them; they don't know how to handle an intense lobbying effort," Wyers says.

Wyers, who joined the council this January after a long career in Democratic Party politics working with her husband, former State Sen. Jan Wyers, was seen as something new for the 12-member council.

In the past, Metro councilors typically have been lesser-known people from business or industry. Few have been party veterans or experienced politicians.

Some looked at Wyers' victory in the election with regret, saying that Metro was in danger of losing its non-partisan, citizen council atmosphere where business has been accomplished quietly and with a minimum of public attention.

Wyers herself disagrees that having a full-fledged politician on the council has been a detriment. Instead, she sees it as an advantage.

Metro can't continue to function with such a low profile anymore, she says, not with savvy corporations such as Waste Management on the scene. And politicians, while they may be the butt of many jokes, do know how to bring public input into the discussion of issues in an effective way.

Wyers's wish to increase Metro's visibility has sometimes put her in conflict with her colleagues. She has been handing out sheets of telephone numbers for all the Metro councilors to the public, and that caused an altercation with District 2 Councilor Lawrence Bauer of Beaverton.

At a council meeting, Bauer told her to stop giving out his home telephone number (the only number he has listed on the Metro information sheet), saying, "Don't you let anyone call me at home ever again," Wyers says. She came right back and told Bauer he was an inexperienced politician.

"That's just blatant inexperience as to his role as a public official," Wyers says.

She says Metro councilors not only should be more available to the public, but they should take their message out to community meetings in order to get people interested and informed about Metro and the issues it faces. She has visited neighborhood association meetings in her district since her election.

Brian Heiberg, co-owner of Heiberg Garbage Service and Recycling in Sellwood, agrees with Wyers, herself a Sellwood resident.

"(Metro councilors) are the people who could be having press conferences and media events," he says. "We need some representation from our Metro councilors. They could be listening to the people of the area they represent."

He would also like to see Metro councilors take the initiative in building better communication.

"I don't ever recall a Metro councilor coming to a (neighborhood association) meeting (before Wyers) and saying, These are some of the things before us," he says.

Wyers describes Metro presiding officer Mike Ragsdale and other councilors as wanting to be "discreet" in their discussions of policy and the day-to-day operation of Metro in order to avoid thorny political debates.

"He doesn't want a higher profile," Wyers says of Ragsdale.

"Generally, there's a feeling on the council that they don't want these things given too much public attention or debate.

"There's a feeling that public input complicates the process rather than enhances it."

Ragsdale responds strongly to Wyers' suggestions.

"What she's saying is ridiculous," he says. He and Metro executive Rena Cusma have spoken about Metro in the community many times and to suggest that any public official would like to restrict public input into the governmental process is "outrageous."

Metro will meet the public's test of maturity by doing good work and nothing else, Ragsdale says.

Metro has an unusual structure, with an executive and a council sharing the same staff, for one thing, and it still hasn't found its legs yet, Wyers says.

"Part of the problem at Metro is that Metro is young," she says. It replaced the Columbia Region Association of Governments only 10 years ago.

Metro is only now learning about the Oregon Public Meetings Law, for example.

"They've got a long way to go, as far as I'm concerned," she says.

One of the requirements of that law is that a quorum of the council cannot meet together without a stipulated amount of public notice. But councilors have met to conduct business without adequate notice to the public, Wyers says.

"It happens," she says.

Ginny Burdick, a former candidate for the state Senate in Southeast and Southwest Portland and now involved with Don't Trash Oregon, echoes Wyers sentiments about organizations that believe that public input is a hindrance to an efficient political process.

She serves as vice chairwoman of the Land Conservation and Development Commission, which has also sometimes shown a reluctance to be visible and active in seeking out communication with the public, she says.

"You cannot go too far in bringing in the public," she says.

Trying to avoid difficulty by avoiding public controversy is always eventually counterproductive, Wyers says.

"I think that Metro needs to come of age as a public body with response to the public, or it's going to continue to be a hidden government that people don't feel good about," she says.

This is to inform you that the Council of the Metropolitan Service District has adopted two resolutions which will lead toward greater cooperation among local governments and citizens in the bi-state Portland-Vancouver metropolitan area. Resolution No. 89-1088A reaffirms the Bi-State Policy Advisory Committee for another two year period as a forum to address problems of mutual concern in the region. Resolution No. 89-1160A supports the nomination of the Columbia River in the national Estuary Program established by section 320 of the Clean Water Act. The designation of the Columbia River as part of the National Estuary Program is a positive step to ensure that we manage this wonderful resource in a wise and effective manner.

The resolutions taken together provide evidence that local governments in the region recognize the Columbia River as a valuable focal point and that there is an established body eager and willing to participate in the development of a management plan for the Columbia River estuary.

If you would like additional information or have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,

This is to advise you, as a member of the Bi-State Policy Advisory Committee, that I am resigning my position on the Metro Council effective September 1. I have also withdrawn from my race for re-election. Health problems and other personal matters are taking an inordinate amount of my time and energy, and I can no longer give my constituents and my colleagues on the Council the attention and representation they deserve.

While there are many reasons I regret having to take this action, I think I will miss most my association with the Bi-State. In my time on the Committee, we took a moribund activity and instilled some real fire into it. We established a solid base for the direction of our activities by adopting by-laws and outlining the areas on which we would focus. We identified some key issues affecting the greater Portland-Vancouver metropolitan area, without regard to state boundaries. These included toll-free dialing, Interstate Bridge operations, Columbia River water quality, Portland International Airport operations, and establishment of meaningful and productive dialogue on air quality issues, where there is still great potential for lasting cooperation and steps to establish consistent regulations between the two states.

Of greatest importance, though, has been the active participation of elected officials from both Oregon and Washington in meeting and recognizing many of our common interests and concerns. Clark County is an integral part of the greater metropolitan region. This is a fact that cannot be controverted, and Bi-State has helped make more policy-makers aware of the interrelations of the governments and the people of our region. I am proud of my association with Bi-State, and encourage you to continue to make this organization a viable and integral part of our regional future.

This is to advise you, as a member of the Bi-State Policy Advisory Committee, that I am resigning my position on the Metro Council effective September 1. I have also withdrawn from my race for re-election. Health problems and other personal matters are taking an inordinate amount of my time and energy, and I can no longer give my constituents and my colleagues on the Council the attention and representation they deserve.

While there are many reasons I regret having to take this action, I think I will miss most my association with the Bi-State. In my time on the Committee, we took a moribund activity and instilled some real fire into it. We established a solid base for the direction of our activities by adopting by-laws and outlining the areas on which we would focus. We identified some key issues affecting the greater Portland-Vancouver metropolitan area, without regard to state boundaries. These included toll-free dialing, Interstate Bridge operations, Columbia River water quality, Portland International Airport operations, and establishment of meaningful and productive dialogue on air quality issues, where there is still great potential for lasting cooperation and steps to establish consistent regulations between the two states.

Of greatest importance, though, has been the active participation of elected officials from both Oregon and Washington in meeting and recognizing many of our common interests and concerns. Clark County is an integral part of the greater metropolitan region. This is a fact that cannot be controverted, and Bi-State has helped make more policy-makers aware of the interrelations of the governments and the people of our region. I am proud of my association with Bi-State, and encourage you to continue to make this organization a viable and integral part of our regional future.

Sincerely,

Larry
